

ALIENATION and FREEDOM

The Factory Worker and His Industry

ROBERT BLAUNER

Chicago

Alienation and Freedom is an imaginative study of the human meaning of factory work. Developing Marx's classic theory of alienation and applying it to present-day industry, Blauner examines the technological, economic, and social forces that determine how the worker experiences his work.

That alienation is no automatic product of modern industrial conditions is demonstrated by the author's method of comparing workers in four settings—print shop, textile mill, automobile factory, and automated chemical plant. Diverse industrial environments produce striking contrasts in the balance of alienation and freedom.

Especially significant is Blauner's analysis of the new forms of blue-collar work in the automated factory, based on original field research in the oil and chemical industries.

Robert Blauner teaches sociology at the University of California in Berkeley.

"Blauner is a very bright young sociologist . . . unique in the sense that he has had extensive direct experience as a worker in a variety of industrial settings. . . . Alienation and Freedom is a welcome contrast to the detailed and narrow case studies which characterize this field."—MORRIS JANOWITZ, The University of Chicago.
